Strong berry season anticipated despite challenges

Despite some early unfavorable weather in the Southeast and Pacific Northwest growing regions, grower-shippers say blueberries, raspberries and blackberries should be plentiful this summer, and quality should be good.

Salinas, Calif.-based Naturipe Farms had one of its most challenging spring weather patterns in years, said Kasey Kelley, senior director of business development. “In the Southeast, we had several freeze events reduce the blueberry crop,” he said. “California had some freeze events, as well, with fluctuating temperatures during the spring that affected both the strawberries and the blueberries.” Average berry size has been smaller than previous years as a result.

“The Pacific Northwest had one of the coldest and wettest springs in years, so all eyes are on how that will eventually affect crop yields and fruit size this season,” Kelley said. A heatwave in California brought a quick end to that crop, which is causing a gap in supply in the West, he said in mid-June. Kelley said he expected blueberry prices to be higher in June and early July compared to last year, then adjust down to similar fob prices in late July and early August. “Raspberries and blackberries will see similar prices to last year,” he said.
