Apples have small but important food service role

Smaller sizes and varieties that are on the lower end of the price scale often are the choice of foodservice buyers, Michigan apple grower-shippers say.

About 6% of the business at Applewood Fresh LLC, Sparta, Mich., was with foodservice customers last season, said Brian Coates, vice president of sales and business development. "Last year was less than what it likely would have been due to a low crop in Michigan," he said. "We did not have fruit to do some of the later-season business we have done in the past and had to end early with some foodservice customers."

The company's foodservice accounts include schools, universities and jails, as well as distributors that provide fruit to restaurants or cruise ships, he said. Standard tray packs of apples without price look-up stickers usually are the package of choice. Much of the foodservice business at BelleHarvest Sales Inc., Belding, Mich., is with school systems, said president Nick Mascari. Sliced apples are popular among students, but the company ships some bulk packages to schools, as well. BelleHarvest also sells apples to large foodservice distributors that supply product to various foodservice accounts.
