Grown in N.J.: How the Garden State lives up to its nickname

New Jersey is the Garden State for good reason. Farmers in New Jersey produce more than 100 different kinds of fruits and vegetables for consumers to enjoy, according to data from Rutgers University. Nationally, New Jersey is one of the top 10 producers of blueberries, cranberries, peaches, tomatoes, bell peppers, eggplant, cucumbers, apples, spinach, squash and asparagus.

In 2022, the state's almost 10,000 farms generated cash receipts of nearly $1.5 billion, according to the New Jersey Department of Agriculture. The nursery/greenhouse/sod industry is the leading commodity group, followed by fruits and vegetables, field crops, equine, poultry and eggs, and dairy. Productive farmland covers more than 710,000 acres, with more than 250,000 of those acres being permanently preserved for agricultural use, according to the NJDA. The state has a rich heritage of fruit and vegetable production. New Jersey's colonial-era settlers cultivated fruits and vegetables for their own families and for trade, according to The New Jersey Historical Commission. In the same way as today, the state's proximity to major markets like New York City and Philadelphia made it an ideal location to grow produce.
