How new research could prevent frost damage in orchards

When spring comes a little early, it can be a harrowing time for fruit growers as trees emerge from dormancy and prepare for bloom. Early spring can come at a cost when Mother Nature once again reminds growers who is in charge with a late-spring frost that can damage emerging buds and blooms.

British Columbia-based Collin Juurakko, founder of Advanced Agriscience, researched frost damage and formation in his post-graduate studies, and he's hoping to take what he learned to develop biological products to mitigate and prevent frost crystals from forming in specialty crop plants.

Advanced Agriscience was named runner-up for Bioenterprise's national Green Pursuit competition in Canada in the fall.
