Why a Busy Store Often Means Better Produce

Slow inventory turn can often lead to losing shoppers' trust — and regaining customer confidence takes time and money, says columnist Armand Lobato.

What do you consider as "fresh"? Fresh means different things to different people. To the untrained eye looking at produce, fresh means ripe, ready to eat or simply free from decay. Fair enough. However, to people in the produce industry, fresh can encompass a range of descriptors. A few thoughts:

For a grower/shipper, fresh may mean that a product is mature, that the grades, sizes and packs meet or exceed USDA and receiver standards, as well as that the produce is handled correctly, is pre-cooled (if applicable), inspected and shipped with confidence of making good arrival at the receiving point.

For a receiver, fresh means that the produce meets the same critical-point checklist. Ensuring that what was ordered is in fact what is on their dock; it also meets specs, arrives on time and is ready to be whisked into reserve — so the produce inventory turns quickly, cycles through with minimal time and maintains the cold chain, and thus, ensures the majority of the shelf life of an item belongs to the customer.
