California's Cherry Season Shifts into High Gear Weeks Ahead of Schedule A record-breaking March heat dome has compressed the state's bloom, which will force growers and retailers to move major promotions up to early May.

The record-setting heat dome in the West in March has pushed California's cherry season to its earliest start, says Chris Zanobini, executive director of the California Cherry Board. Zanobini says the season should begin in late April and end the third week of May. "We're expecting we won't have any production after Memorial Day," he says. "Really, the cherry season is going to be the last week of April through the third and a half week of May."

He says the record heat, which was about 20°F to 30°F above average, created a compressed bloom throughout the Golden State. "Bakersfield all the way up to essentially Sacramento bloomed at the same time," he says. "It had a very quick bloom, so pretty much everything is going to be harvesting at the same time." Zanobini says this early start will likely challenge the state's cherry logistics.
