Despite Regional Weather Setbacks, Growing Demand Spurs Summer Berry Optimism

Despite early-season weather hurdles, the berry industry is highly optimistic about the 2026 summer season due to stabilizing production, exceptional consumer demand and projected volume increases.

Scary winter weather and freak freezes in the spring didn't cool down the growing intensity of consumer berry demand. This reality has stoked optimism in berry growers and industry groups for this summer season, as well as laid out a course for the future to meet that demand. For the year ending May 17, 2026, sales by volume across the entire fresh berry segment grew 3.1% at 2.908 billion pounds sold compared to the prior year. The same time saw retail dollar sales for all berries across the U.S. for both brick-and-mortar and online food retailers increase 4.5% to $12.96 billion. This data comes from Circana OmniMarket Integrated Fresh, a Chicago-based market research firm.

The Circana data also shows that for the top four fresh berries — strawberries, blueberries, raspberries and blackberries — blueberries drove much of this increase with 4.3% gain in volume at 748.2 million pounds sold during the period. Raspberries and blackberries also saw volume gains of 16.9% (236.7 million pounds) and 8.7% (176.4 million pounds), respectively. Though still the ranking berry, strawberries stayed almost flat with 1.68 billion pounds (up 0.3%) sold for the year ending May 17, according to Circana.
