Data Shows Summer Recalls Drove Leafy Greens Category Abandonment

An analysis of 147 million shopping trips during the summer 2026 cyclospora outbreak reveals that news coverage — rather than localized risk or price points — drove a sharp, persistent drop in leafy greens sales that price cuts failed to fix.

Swiftly analyzed 147 million shopping trips across 4,856 grocery stores and 26 retail banners measure how consumers reacted to the recent cyclospora outbreak. The findings? Consumers stopped buying lettuce, regardless of the type. The data shows leafy greens unit sales fell 18% over a seven-week period, reaching a trough of -25.5% during the week the outbreak was officially announced.

The Impact of National Media on Consumer Behavior

Rather than isolated regional drops, the decline was overwhelmingly propelled by media coverage, says Sean Turner, Swiftly chief technology officer.
