Sunny Outlook for Florida Tomato Season

Things look good this season in the Sunshine State for tomato growers, says Robert Guenther, executive vice president of the Florida Tomato Exchange and manager of the Florida Tomato Committee. Things look good this season in the Sunshine State for tomato growers, says Robert Guenther, executive vice president of the Florida Tomato Exchange and manager of the Florida Tomato Committee. Help from weather conditions and regulatory changes all bode well for this year's crop and for future domestic demand, he says. Guenther sat down with The Packer to discuss this season's outlook and the immediate impacts of the end of the U.S.-Mexico Tomato Suspension Agreement.

How is this year's tomato crop looking so far compared to last season?

Guenther: We have had a strong start to the season. Unlike last year, having to deal with two hurricanes back to back, this year we have seen exceptional growing conditions for tomatoes here in Florida (knock on wood), which is producing some of the best quality tomatoes growers have seen in years.
