Inside the Relay Race Behind New Mexico's Onion and Chile Seasons

From regenerative soil practices and AI-driven packing sheds to nationwide roasting roadshows, top growers and distributors reveal the logistical and marketing machinery driving the expanding coastal demand for New Mexico's signature summer crops.

Long before the first fresh peppers are harvested, a logistical and agricultural machinery is quietly set into motion across the Southwest. The journey of bringing New Mexico's signature sweet onions and legendary chilies to grocery shelves nationwide is a high-stakes summer relay race powered by ecological innovation, cutting-edge automation and masterclass retail storytelling.

The Groundwork: Regenerative Soil and the Sweet Onion Prelude

The legendary flavor profile of New Mexico's produce begins entirely in the dirt. At the heart of the state's agricultural footprint is Legacy Fresh LLC, the sales and marketing arm for Billy the Kid Produce, which manages a 3,000-acre operation in Deming and Las Cruces. To combat the harsh realities of the Southwestern climate, company President Chris Franzoy has spent the last few years steering the farm toward aggressive regenerative agricultural practices. By creating and applying custom compost to their fields annually — and combining it with alfalfa hay and grass crop rotations — Legacy Fresh has successfully rebuilt its soil health and ecosystem functions.
