Why State EPR Packaging Fees Are Actually a Heavy New Produce Tax

Rochelle Bohm of CMI Orchards discusses the threat that extended producer responsibility laws pose to the fresh produce industry and why the high cost of sustainable packaging will be passed on to consumers.

Rochelle Bohm, vice president of marketing for CMI Orchards, warns that the impacts of extended producer responsibility, or EPR, laws will be significant. On "The Packer Podcast," she says any additional expenses will be catastrophic to an industry with already tight margins. Bohm says some of the largest publicly traded produce companies have around 2% margins, and for some companies, that figure is even lower.

"We don't have the capacity to absorb any additional fees without risking more growers going out of business and more major consolidations, which we are already seeing in a big way in Washington state," she says. Bohm deliberately refers to the EPR fees as a tax, calling it "one more nail in the coffin for growers" who already have high labor costs and weather extremes. She argues that EPRs are applied at a rate based on the type of packaging material used and its weight. "You're assessed based on what you're shipping into that state," she says. "So, that to us is a tax." Bohm says for CMI Orchards, the tax for selling into Oregon will be between $10,000 and $20,000, which she says is low because the company doesn't sell a lot of produce into the state. But with California, it's another story. While she says the produce industry is awaiting the state's final fee structure, based on the draft structures, the numbers are significant.
