Florida Growers Face a Lingering Impact After Heartbreaking 12-Hour Freeze

From “perfect storms” to record-breaking shifts, University of Florida experts break down the devastating impact on specialty crops and why resilience remains the only path forward.

There's no question that Florida's specialty crops were impacted by a late January, early February freeze, but the severity of the damage depends both on the crop and the location. Philip Harmon, professor of plant pathology and extension specialist with the University of Florida's Institute of Food and Agricultural Sciences, describes the damage he's seen from the state's blueberry growers as “devastating.”

“Growing fruits and vegetables in Florida is a challenging career to take,” he says. But one thing Harmon knows about the state's blueberry growers is that no matter the challenge, these growers will replant. “The consistent human side of this is that these guys are resilient,” he says. “They're super hardworking, and they are not the kind of people to give up.”

A Year of Income Lost in One Night

Harmon, located in Gainesville, Fla., says the damage varies across the state and by variety. He's seen damage on young blueberry plantings and plantings 20 years or older, all hit by the storm.
