Peruvian Sweet Onion Programs Hold Firm Amid Cost Pressures

Despite rising operational costs and potential acreage cuts in Peru, major U.S. importers report steady volume, high quality and refreshed marketing programs as the Peruvian sweet onion season kicks off to bridge the Vidalia gap.

Rising costs and falling profits are expected to prompt some Peruvian sweet onion growers to reduce acreage this season, but major U.S. importers say their programs should remain virtually unchanged. "Pressure on ROI has been a challenge for the Peruvian sweet onion industry over the last few years, with the sweet onion market generally failing to keep up with inflation and increased operating costs," says John Shuman, president and CEO of Reidsville, Ga.-based Shuman Farms. "But our program has not cut back any at this time; we expect to have sufficient supplies of Peruvian sweet onions available throughout the season." Quality of Peruvian onions from Shuman Farms looked "really good" as of late August, Shuman says.

"We are seeing a bit higher percentage than normal of smaller jumbos to large mediums on the front half of our crop, but we believe this year's crop has an average size profile overall," he says. G&R Farms, Glennville, Ga., didn't reduce its Peruvian onion program either, says Steven Shuman, general manager and vice president of sales.
