Cherry season shaping up well for volume and quality

Good growing conditions this spring have set up an almost perfect cherry crop in the Pacific Northwest, marketers say.

Favorable weather this spring has set the Northwest up for what is hoped to be a great cherry season. "We couldn't have been luckier with the weather this growing season," said Brianna Shales, marketing director for Stemilt Growers, a Wenatchee, Wash.-based grower-packer-shipper.

"At this point, the orchards are looking great with no notable frost or rain. We had a good bloom period with warmer temps and great bee activity. Of course, Mother Nature can always change things." Joel Hewitt, vice president of sales for the Wenatchee-based CMI Orchards, said an early spring with warm, dry weather helped create excellent pollination and fruit set.

"This year's cherry crop is off to a great start, thanks to a relatively mild spring across the Pacific Northwest," Hewitt said. "We've avoided the extremes, no damaging cold snaps or heat spikes, which has made a world of difference for growers." A winter freeze impacted the overall 2024 crop size in Washington, but that's not the case this year, which marketers hope will allow for an extended harvest into September.
