Melon programs see smooth shift from domestic to offshore growing regions

With a few weeks left in the domestic melon season, Westside Produce/Classic Fruit is reflecting on another successful harvest across its California and Arizona growing regions as they prepare for their offshore operations. The company reports a strong finish for cantaloupes and honeydews, supported by steady demand and dedicated retail, foodservice and fresh-cut partners across the country. Cantaloupe and honeydew melons out of the westside of California have just wrapped up and transitioned to Yuma for the remainder of the domestic season. "The transition from California to Arizona was right on schedule," said Garrett Patricio, president of Westside Produce. "We had a small overlap of production but sufficient to cover the needs of all customers in different regions. This continues to allow us to provide an uninterrupted supply of melons to our customers, no matter the time of year or growing season."

Tom Ferguson, vice president of sales at Classic Fruit, agreed: "The increase in melon production was difficult, but our alliance navigated through those periods very well, giving us the success that it did." Another persistent challenge this season has been inclement weather. Patricio said, "Late season rains in California and Arizona have created some gaps in harvest and presented a challenge getting clean fruit out of the field." "We know the transition periods in spring and fall are the most challenging, but we navigate these periods to take care of our core customers," said Ferguson.
