THE PACKER

Why the Produce Aisle is Finally Embracing Sensory-Inclusive Packaging Designs

According to PRS In Vivo Sensory Room lab research, frustration-free packaging is more than just a nice perk because it gives a competitive edge to brands that support neurodivergent shoppers, making life easier for all shoppers as a result.

For many consumers, packaging is a persistent, if minor, adversary. Research shows the average person will spend roughly 43 days of their life struggling to open products, with 84% of shoppers reporting regular frustration. But for neurodivergent individuals and those with sensory sensitivities, these aren't just "wrap rage" moments. They are significant barriers to independence.

As we mark Neurodiversity Celebration Week this March, the retail industry is shifting its perspective, moving from seeing packaging as a purely functional or aesthetic challenge to a vital sensory and accessibility issue. Leading this charge is retail insights agency PRS In Vivo. In April 2025, the agency unveiled its sensory room as part of its global retail labs — state-of-the-art simulated supermarket environments. By observing real-world interactions, their researchers have pinpointed how visual clutter and tactile friction specifically exclude the 15% of the global population living with disabilities.
