What to Expect From a Promising Strawberry Season

The popular berries have had good numbers with shipping so far, creating plenty of retail opportunities headed into the summer holidays.

Strawberry movement is off to a robust start as the spring/summer season gets underway. As of April 18, California growers had shipped 47.8 million trays of eight 1-pound clamshells of conventional and organic strawberries, according to the Watsonville-based California Strawberry Commission. That's up from 32.7 million trays at the same time last year.

Chris Christian, the commission's vice president of market insights, attributes the volume surge to "unusually warm, dry winter weather in addition to new varieties and an increase in fall planted acreage."

As the season progresses, she expects production to remain near the state's three-year averages. Total California strawberry production for 2025 was 236.7 million trays. Meanwhile, Florida's production to date was about 20 million trays, down from about 30 million a year ago. Mexico's production was 41.6 million trays, down from 49.2 million last year at this time.
